Both Photoshop Elements and Photoshop are graphics software. However, while Photoshop Elements focuses on simple edits and retouching, Photoshop provides advanced features and many of the same editing capabilities. In addition, there are several programs that feature similar names, such as the Apple iPhoto program and the Google Pixel Mix. Some people use Photoshop to create logos, and have made and used the "Photoshop" logo. However, in 2001, Adobe released Photoshop Elements, which is a lighter and simpler program. The logo, designed by artist Richard Rinehart, was used as a logo for Adobe's graphics software. Elements and Photoshop are sold separately, with Photoshop Elements being cheaper than Photoshop, and has some editing features that are not in Photoshop. In February 2005, Adobe released a new version of Photoshop called Photoshop CS. It is easier to use than previous versions, but does not have all the editing features of Photoshop. Photoshop Elements 12 is included with Windows users, and comes with the latest version of Photoshop Elements. Photoshop CS 3 was released in 2007 and included Photoshop Elements 10. The best known and most useful of these are the exposure, brightness, color, contrast and color balance sliders. Use them to modify the look of your images however you wish. Use the other menus as well, if you are familiar with how to modify these properties. With the image selected, you can either click the effects tab and use the effect menus, or simply right-click on a specific effect, and choose from the effects menu that appears. Some of the effects are simply there to display in the image window, and can't be used. To learn more about the effects at your disposal, right click on the image and choose: Effects | Edit Effects. You can choose from the following effects: -Blur- Apply to: whole image. -Gradient Map- Gradient maps are a useful tool for reproducing bright colours. They are created by using a single source and applying that to multiple locations across an image. They are much easier to create than regular halftones, which require dozens of copies of the same image (and should be set as the background). Gradient maps have some limitations, however. They can only be used

Tell the truth, though, and most people outside the world of professional wrestling would be surprised to hear that (as the wrestlers put it) the "women's revolution" is really only about increasing the number of women who appear on a regular basis. They're talented and skilled at this stuff, just like the men, and they've proven this time and time again. But that doesn't mean women are going to be getting the same treatment by the WWE, which has become a male-focused enterprise and which still has a long way to go to acknowledge all women on equal footing. Even in the 1990's, when women did have a stronger footing in the WWE, few were willing to acknowledge the genre's real strength – which is in the "women's wrestling" put together by women for women. Part of the cause of this is the TV ratings, which were going down in the 1990's and haven't gotten any better in the years since. In 2001, WWE featured only 11 matches with women on television. In 2011, they were on the air 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. They've been ramping up the number of women on their shows and in their magazines ever since, but that influx of talent didn't translate to new TV ratings. They're going to keep trying, but the efforts aren't going to change things overnight. Not that there's any reason for them to be any different – the men all want to make money, just like the women. It's not like the women get more money for working in the ring, and they're not the primary breadwinners for the company. They're also not getting the same perks or the same protection. The point is, there's really no reason that women should have an easier time making a living in the wrestling industry than men, or an easier time advancing their careers. Women are on a similar level with men in the industry, not behind them. We're still a long way off from the day when WWE features as many women on TV as they do men. But when that day comes, fans will be clamoring for more episodes with the new crop of talented women they're adding to their shows all the time.--- name: Feature request about: Suggest an idea
