Q: Sockets and threading I have a web application that's open to the internet, listening for input from clients. When a client sends a command, a thread gets created, and the input is transferred to it via `select()`. Now, multiple threads can be listening for this, and they send their reply to the client one by one. My question is, if a thread tries to send multiple messages to the client (think of a chat client), will each message be sent, or only the last? Cheers

A: if a thread tries to send multiple messages to the client No. The standard only guarantees that at most one handler thread is in the running state at any time, and that handler thread receives a `SocketChannel` notification when data arrives on the socket (to call `shutdownOutput()`) and that notification is delivered to that handler's waiting queue. It's the clients responsibility to manage the I/O flow that they want to implement; if the protocol requires multiple replies to a single command, the threads handling the requests should create a queue for the responses and schedule them to be sent back to the client via the select or equivalent API. will each message be sent, or only the last? Each of the messages will be sent, but the order is not guaranteed. If you are worried about managing the ordering, you can use a synchronized block to ensure it's in the same order as the responses arrive. using System; using Alachisoft.NCache.Services.Layers; using Alachisoft.NCache.Models.Util; using Alachisoft.NCache.Caching; using Microsoft.VisualStudio.TestTools.UnitTesting;

years ago, Paul Ryan said he wanted to abolish the Department of Education in favor of block granting the money to states. As it turns out, the next month, Ryan was picked by Mitt Romney to be his running mate on the 2012 Presidential ticket. This announcement provoked a flurry of criticism from education reformers. Congressman Jeb Hensarling, an education leader in the House Republican Caucus, said "As a candidate for vice president, Romney has chosen someone who not only wants to abolish the Department of Education but also promises to veto a bill requiring school districts to report on how students are doing on standardized tests." Hensarling, of course, was referring to then-candidate Ryan's comments that he opposed President Obama's plan to change mandatory testing to include student progress on the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP) tests. Hensarling, Ryan and other education reformers want to see all students have the right to graduate from high school and go on to college or the job-market. A leaked memo about Ryan's selection prompted the disdain. The memo said that the plan to abolish the DOE was "highly disingenuous." Since then, it appears Ryan has abandoned his rhetoric about doing away with the Department. At last week's GOP national convention, Ryan praised the DOE and said it should be funded
