To assess the medium-term outcome of a surgical and endoscopic treatment for severe primary and secondary superior mesenteric artery syndrome. This study is a retrospective study including 23 patients undergoing combined surgical and endoscopic treatment from 2005 to 2012. The primary end point of the study was the symptoms and complications at a follow-up of one year. The secondary end points were the re-interventions, the morbi-mortality and the functional state of the patients at the end of follow-up. A significant change was observed in the mean BMI of the patients after 12 months from the procedure, from 25.4 to 24.7. A significant reduction of the mean BMI was also observed in patients with postoperative complications (p = 0.03). Within the limitations of this study, the surgical-endoscopic treatment of superior mesenteric artery syndrome is a promising strategy to be considered in young patients with severe systemic manifestations that are not possible to control by medical treatment alone. Larger studies are needed to further determine its role in clinical practice.In the firefighting industry, there are numerous applications in which a firefighter is expected to wear a garment that is so constructed
