Remember when the Internet was a big deal? We're not talking about the dial-up AOL.com, or even the fire-and-brimstone CNN.com. We're talking about the "good old days" of the early 1990s. The Internet used to be a place where people could keep in touch with friends, check their email, and find out the latest news all at once. Life was simpler before the world wide web. Sadly, the Internet is once again on the verge of becoming a "time waster." In the future, you can be stuck on a plane with a Googler by accident. Or your Netflix will mysteriously freeze and you'll have to use Google to find something to watch. It's not surprising that we're starting to see a decline in Internet usage because of this. While this is indeed a problem, luckily we have the World Wide Web Consortium (W3C) to design great standards and help us enjoy the web today. In fact, the W3C is working on a new standard that will let you set up your browser to automatically remember what you've chosen to like. We spoke with Mike Beltzner, W3C's Director of Media Experience, to learn more about the new W3C standard, the People's Choice design, and how you can

At this point, we recognise it's a blog for experts, we also enjoy many factors that are family or home based, recycling and small scale energy systems. Tongue is cut out. So we're passing through a sitting room, to a wooden staircase and a bathroom, with a shower in the bathroom. When we last left the house, we were in a spacious kitchen: but the builder is tearing everything apart to provide space for the sitting room. In any case, since a fire could not have been lived through without water, it is worth including a bathroom in a 20th century house. Bathroom, sink, vanity, cabinets and waste plunger We start the tour on the first floor We'll continue at a second floor We'll finish in the attic and finish the walk around the house Salicyclic acid calcium alginate as potential nontoxic microencapsulated inhibitor of Enterococcus faecalis. This research aims to develop a non-cytotoxic and non-genotoxic microencapsulated formulation of a previously tested biological inhibitor against Enterococcus faecalis (E. faecalis). The microencapsulated formulation, referred as "salicyclic acid calcium alginate" (SACA) was prepared from alginate, sacyclic acid and calcium. In this procedure, different percentages of sacyclic acid (5-20 mg) were entrapped in alginate (2-4% w/v, 2% w/v or 4% w/v) under the influence of calcium chloride. The in vitro release and activity of calcium and sacyclic acid from various encapsulated formulations were studied using spectrophotometer and MTT assay. The percent mortalities observed with various microencapsulated formulation were significantly (p

Has Left More Than 20 Dead And Cities Hosed With Toxic Water Enlarge this image toggle caption New York City Fire Dept. New York City Fire Dept. Updated at 1:45 p.m. ET Thursday It was the worst tropical storm ever to hit the U.S. Gulf Coast — and now it's wreaking havok again. Tropical Storm Harvey has hammered south Texas, displacing tens of thousands of residents and damaging homes, roads, bridges and a hospital, and now it's headed toward Louisiana. Dozens of people are dead, more than 26 million people are under evacuation orders and another 50 million people in Texas and neighboring states have been told to stay away from the coast by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. And here are the scary details. Storm Activity At 4 a.m. Thursday, Harvey had peaked at Category 4 strength, a lesser version of a Category 5 storm. But by early Thursday, it was headed toward Louisiana and Arkansas as a Category 3 storm. It weakened briefly to a Category 2 hurricane, and then neared major hurricane strength again later in the day on Thursday. The storm has been designated "a monstrous inland flood" by The Weather Channel's chief meteorologist. It's five times the size of Houston, is ripping roofs off homes and has been dropping nearly two feet of rain in some areas. Much of the at-risk area of South Texas is being inundated with rain. Before the storm, forecasters said Houston and other cities were at low risk for the storm. That changed Wednesday after the rainfall quickly piled up in rivers and creeks. "By the end of [Wednesday] night, the rain [had] been driven so far inland that the low-level circulation of the storm system was ripped away. That's why we saw the tracks that we saw coming into Houston," said meteorologist Eric Holthaus on Twitter. "It is a monster." Forecasters said that in the Houston area, areas which did not receive that first dose of rain would be in line for 4 to 6 inches of rain on Thursday. "That's what we're seeing this morning," National Weather Service meteorologist Jason Donovan told NPR. "As we head into the afternoon and the day progresses, those areas are going to get pounded pretty good." Without the rain, Houston was not just rain. Rain had started to fall on Tuesday but the storm system was still far away. After a quick
