Â· Octopus.Q: Pronounced /di/ vs. /ti/ in South American Spanish I've heard a few people in Argentina, and probably elsewhere, pronounce /ti/ as /di/ instead of /tɪ/. This sometimes ends up sounding more like /tɪ/ (like an "i" sound).

I've noticed that this is particularly common with Argentines (and all Spaniards), among people not too old. It appears the issue is that /di/ and /ti/ are actually phonemes, but that /di/ is more common than /ti/. Am I correct in my thinking? If so, is there a reason this should be the case (it's the same phone, after all)? A: This is not an uncommon pronunciation, especially in Argentina. I've even heard people pronounce the /t/ as /d/ before the vowels, instead of /ɪ/, /e/ or /i/, especially in the southern regions. The reason for this appears to be that the /t/ can be a "hole" and the /ɪ/ or /i/ is considered to be very close and hard to say. This behavior of the tongue is easily adopted by more people, not just from Argentina, but from Spain as well. A: A very interesting phenomenon is the agudized

[d] in English. It means with a slight click of the tongue. As a native Spanish speaker you can hear in many US accents how it is pronounced in some Spaniards and only to Spanish speakers. I've noticed in Argentina and Venezuela, both Spanish speaking countries, the agudized [d] is sometimes pronounced in all the Spanish accents. Q: Remove DIV/HTML tag using Regex.Matcher I'm using C# and Regex.Matcher to remove a DIV/HTML tag from some HTML using :

Regex.Match(html.ToString(), @"()[^)"); I get some strange results. I want to have only the text that is between the html tags. How can I fix the regex? I'm trying to remove a floating menu from an ASP.NET web form. A: It seems
