The potential role of the dust/dangerous and allergenic properties of biological respiratory allergens in the evolution of the immunologic mechanisms of respiratory allergic diseases. A considerable body of evidence has shown the importance of mast cells and its mediators in the onset and maintenance of the immune and allergic reactions. In this context, our group has studied the role of the dust/dangerous factors of some biological allergens on the maturation and activation of rat mast cells. The results indicate that hazardous biological agents are capable of inducing different patterns of activation in mast cells, which change their functional behaviour and influence the course of the pathophysiological process. The results also show that the dust/dangerous and allergenic properties of biological allergens can participate in the evolution of the immunological mechanisms of allergic respiratory diseases.
