Q: How to pass arguments to python code? Is it possible to pass arguments to python function in window functions? How to do so? If so, I would like to understand how to do so because I didn't find any usefull examples.

A: There are two options: a) Python with Pyrex or Cython If the Python function is not provided by the library, you need a Python library, Pyrex or Cython. The former way uses pyrex whereas the latter way is better (as it uses Cython) The interface using the Python API is documented here. b) Python with the library If your module works with the Python API, you can use it as you would normally use. If your module works with the C API, you can also use it like that: c) Python module with C extension If you can convert your Python module into a C extension, you can use any way that is documented. Note: B and C are not mutually exclusive, as most of the Python modules that expose the C API are written in Cython. Examples The following example uses a Python module with a C API (providing the C API directly) `from my_lib import * func_x(a=1, b=2)` The following example uses a Python module with a Python API (written in Python, providing the Python API directly) `from my_lib import * func_x(a=1, b=2)` The following example uses a Python module with
