I need these objects to be moved by the user with a Gesture(MotionEvent.MouseDrag). The only way I found is to create a normal Android application that will run the QML and add a Button to switch to that running application. Is there a way to do it without this extra Android app that uses OpenGL? Thanks A: Is there a way to do it without this extra Android app that uses OpenGL? Yes, you should be able to do it in a single QML application by using the pageSource property of the ApplicationWindow instance. See ApplicationWindow.source. For example, if you needed an application with a single QML window that, when executed, would load the QML-based "slider" content, you would do the following: ApplicationWindow { id: applicationWindow visible: true width: 600 height: 600
